Discussion Questions

Committed: a Skeptic Makes Peace with Marriage
by Elizabeth Gilbert

Source: Penguin Group us.penguingroup.com and Madison Public Library

1. Gilbert, who has been through a divorce, calls herself a skeptic about marriage. Do you think a certain amount of skepticism about the institution is healthy or is it unromantic?
2. Why do Gilbert and Felipe react so strongly to the Homeland Security officer's suggestion that they tie the knot?
3. When encountering the Hmong people, Gilbert is taken by their cultural belief that men and women are "mostly the same, most of the time." What does this say about their ideas and expectations about marriage, and how does that contrast with Gilbert's?
4. Gilbert weaves in cultural and religious history and a bit of on-the-spot anthropological research with her own personal story. What did these lessons from the past and other cultures teach her, as a potential bride, and what did they teach you, as the reader?
5. Some reviewers and readers have found her mix of personal story and research not to their liking. Did you like this blend in the narrative? Did you want it to be more of one or the other?
6. A reviewer in Kirkus [included in this discussion guide] called the book 'vaguely depressing'. Do you agree? How is the tone of the book different from Eat, Pray Love? Did you like that book better? Why?
7. Gilbert discusses a few factors that contribute to a marriage's success or failure, and she analyzes her relationship with Felipe in this context. What other factors might predict the outcome of a marriage?
8. Committ examines the ways marriage has been politicized and controlled by laws, reflecting the way it socially imposed meaning and purpose has changed over time. What role does marriage play in our current society?
